SHERLOCK HOLMES RADIO BROADCASTS

There have been many well-known fictional characters in the world, many of whom have been impersonated on the stage, screen and in broadcast media. Certain of these characters have been adapted and changed over and over again but their popularity never seems to wane. Characters from the pens of Charles Dickens, H.G. Wells, Fran Striker and countless others have thrilled us with their exploits on radio.

There is however, one fictional character whose dramatized adventures have far exceeded those of any other character and this is the famous consulting detective, Sherlock Holmes. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's best known creation appeared in four novels and 56 short stories and untold other variations based on these original works.

Sherlock Holmes has appeared in every form of public entertainment over the last 100 or so years and we have grown to accept a stylized version of how he looked and where he lived. We had our own version of Sherlock, helped by our imagination and the numerous sketches and drawings provided by Sidney Paget. If asked, almost everyone will describe Sherlock as being rather tall, thin, with a hooked nose and wearing a deerstalker cap, cape-backed overcoat and smoking a curved pipe. This may be what we visualize, but Sherlock was never described by Conan Doyle in this manner.

Perhaps our visualization of Sherlock's looks came as much from watching him portrayed by Basil Rathbone in the movies, or from the mental creation our minds made while listening to one of the radio versions. And surely again, Basil Rathbone played a large part here as his starring role is considered by most older radio fans to have been the best Sherlock on radio.

There have been other detectives portrayed on the radio, but the most enduring one has been Sherlock Holmes. The first episode broadcast in the United States was The Adventure of the Speckled Band which was heard on October 20, 1930. Holmes was played by American actor William Gillette and was quickly replaced in the series by Clive Brook. Leigh Lovell played Dr. Watson from the beginning until 1936 when he was replaced by Harry West. Richard Gordon replaced Clive Brook in 1931 and remained in the role until 1934 when he was replaced for one year by Luis Hector. Gordon returned when the series resumed in February, 1936 and remained until the series ended in late December.

Edith Meiser wrote all of the scripts from the beginning in 1930 until late 1943, a total of at least 100 or more original scripts. Many of her scripts were repeated several times, and others were re-worked. The Conan Doyle estate had approved her writing of the scripts, some of which were faithful to the original stories while others were based loosely on suggested incidents and characters from the stories. Denis Green, Anthony Boucher and Bruce Taylor assumed the writing chores in late 1943 and both Boucher and Green continued on until the middle of 1947. Some records show that Edith Meiser returning as writer for the series in September 1947 until June 1948, although these may be story repeats.

Sherlock Holmes left the air in December, 1936 and did not return until October, 1939 when Basil Rathbone and Nigel Bruce began what many people consider as the best radio series on the air.

In April 1939, the first of the fourteen Sherlock Holmes movies starring Basil Rathbone and Nigel Bruce was released. This film proved so popular that the second, and last Twentieth Century Fox film, was made and released in August of the same year. Sherlock Holmes was a success once again and it was only natural to capitalize on this by signing the two actors to a Sherlock Holmes radio series.

This radio series lasted from October, 1939 until May, 1946 when Rathbone left to pursue other interests. Nigel Bruce remained as Dr. Watson from October 1946 to May 1947 and Tom Conway appeared as Sherlock Holmes. The magic between these two was not the same as when Rathbone was there and both actors were replaced after one season. Other actors tried to fill the void left by Rathbone and Bruce, but none succeeded for more than a short period of time and the radio series ended in June, 1950. No other American series was ever to be heard and dramatic radio was slowly being replaced by music radio, disk jockeys, and that upstart, television.

Another series was heard on the radio in 1955, this one written and recorded in Great Britain especially for broadcast on NBC in the United States. This short series starred Sir John Gielgud as Sherlock and Sir Ralph Richardson as Watson. Then one final series heard in the United States appeared in 1982 when National Public Radio broadcast twenty-six re-edited episodes starring Carleton Hobbs and Norman Shelley on NPR Playhouse.

Overseas, there have been numerous short series aired on BBC radio, most of them starring Carleton Hobbs as Sherlock and Norman Shelley as Watson. Copies of many of these recordings are available in the United States from various dealers and club libraries. Most of them are undated however.

Two single Sherlock Holmes stories and a parody appeared on the radio in the United States. William Gillette played Sherlock in an Edith Meiser adaptation of his stage play on Lux Radio Theater on November 18, 1935. Orson Welles portrayed Sherlock on his Mercury Theater On The Air on September 25, 1938. This performance was adapted from the Gillette play by Orson Welles who also played Sherlock. Alien Worlds broadcast a parody in 1979 and several episodes were dramatized on CBS Radio Mystery Theater in the late 1970's and early 1980's.

Broadcast times listed are Eastern Standard and networks and sponsors, if known, are shown. An extensive search of available sources has failed to determine the names of several episodes. In these cases, blanks have been left so that they may be completed when the episode titles become available.

SHERLOCK HOLMES MOVIES

Sherlock Holmes films date back to the earliest days of movies. Sherlock Holmes Baffled was a very short film copyrighted in 1903 and was the first known film. Maurice Costello was the first recorded Sherlock in the 1905 The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes which was one reel long. Following this there were several comedy parodies, at least one with Buster Keaton, until the first serious film was made in 1916 starring William Gillette and based on his famous stage play.

Ellie Norwood perhaps contributed the most material to the genre by completing two regular and at least 45 short movies in the period from 1921 to 1923. The well-known John Barrymore brought his famous profile to the screen as Sherlock in 1922 with many scenes faithfully recreated in both London and Switzerland.

Then in 1929 sound came to the Sherlock legend with Clive Brook's film. This added a dimension to the character previously only available in stage plays and enabled the stories to be better dramatized.

Other well-known stars played Sherlock in the early sound films. Raymond Massey starred in Sherlock Holmes in 1931, and Robert Rendel and Reginald Owen both had single film appearances. The most used actor during the early sound period was Arthur Wontner who starred in five films between 1931 and 1937 and who was an almost ideal Sherlock. Then in 1939 with the release of The Hound of the Baskervilles, Basil Rathbone and Nigel Bruce gained their most famous starring roles in the series which culminated with the release of the 14th, and final, Dressed to Kill in 1946.

Other films have followed starring such diverse actors as Peter Cushing, Christopher Lee, Christopher Plummer, and George C. Scott, all of which have added to the historic legend of the famous consulting detective.

SHERLOCK HOLMES TELEVISION STORIES

Very few Sherlock Holmes stories were televised in the early years of television, and this has carried through to the present time. Several stories of interest have appeared with only four being aired before the middle 1950's. The first, and largest, group of programs was the series of 39 black and white films made expressly for the American television audience in 1953-54. After this series, a total of six individual shows have appeared.

Television Public Broadcasting has made available an excellent series of Sherlock Holmes stories on the Mystery Series of programs. In this modern series of programs, Jeremy Brett plays Sherlock, a role he seemed destined to play. His portrayal of Sherlock has been said to be one of the best of all the actors who have ever carried this role. The stories are accurately set in the proper Victorian times and the scenery and sets are appropriate for the stories. The stories are filmed in Great Britain, which along with the actors, gives the films an authentic feel.

Very few of the television versions reappear, and most of the Sherlock Holmes stories currently seen on television are the movie versions. Occasionally a television story is repeated. For this, see the PBS Mystery Series for the most recent series of repeats.

BBC TELEVISION
SHERLOCK HOLMES

Several short, non-memorable series have appeared on British (BBC) television beginning in 1951 with a series of six shows starring Alan Wheatley as Sherlock and Raymond Francis as Dr. Watson. This series was done live, then a break of about 14 years occurred before the next series.

In 1964, BBC-TV showed The Speckled Band starring Douglas Wilmer as Sherlock, and Nigel Stock as Watson, then expanded into a 1965 series of 12 additional plays. These shows were repeated again in 1966. The late Victorian scenes were faithfully recreated in each of these 55 minute episodes. Douglas Wilmer played Sherlock and Nigel Stock played Watson in each of the episodes.

Another series appeared in 1968 which starred Peter Cushing as Sherlock and Nigel Stock as Dr. Watson. The hour long stories were not well written and were poorly produced, however the location filming of the story locales was excellent.
